Art investments are typically not correlated with traditional financial markets like stocks and bonds. Meaning that art's performance may not align with broader economic trends or provide consistent returns. Historically the price performance of certified pink diamonds from the Argyle mine had a strong correlation with fine art. However, since 2012, Argyle certified diamond prices have risen substantially, well surpassing the floundering performance of the Top 100 Art Market Index.

At the beginning of 2022, there was a significant surge in the cost of casks whiskey. This was attributed to a decrease in the availability of barrels and an increase in the number of companies selling casks whiskey as an investment, unfortunately, many of these companies charged premiums above market value, coursing overall cask prices to reach a point where they were no longer viable, causing many independent bottlers to decrease or cease their orders. Multiple indexes suggest that the decrease in cask auction prices is ongoing, indicating the secondary whiskey market is in a state of downturn. This decline points towards a potential plateau in future price increases within the cask industry. (Forbes, Carsk Trade, The Spirits Business)

HOW RARE ARE ARGYLE CERTIFIED DIAMONDS?

To emphasise the rarity of certified pink diamonds from the Argyle mine, total global diamond production from 2005 to 2020 totalled a staggering 2.24 billion carats. However, between the introduction of the Argyle laser inscription in 2005 and the mine's closure in 2020, the estimated total production of certified Argyle pink, blue, and red diamonds was just 13,436 carats. This equates to a minuscule percentage of 0.0006%.

Industry predictions indicate that the global market will consistently see the addition of more than 120 million carats of fresh diamond material each year, without any new supply of pink, red or blue diamonds extracted from the Argyle mine. This will contribute to the growing scarcity and appreciation of these rare Australian pink diamonds.
